More about partnerships Emily Manevska/Getty Images Add effects and transitions to your iMovie 10 projects. Both functions are separate to iMovie 10, so the first set of steps below refers to the effects, and the second set refers to transitions. This article applies to iMovie 10. To access video and audio effects in iMovie, open the project on the timeline. Double-click the clip on the timeline. Click the Customize button in the upper-right corner of the screen. The second button from the right, after i, is the effect icon. Click the Effect icon to display windows that display available audio and video effects for iMovie. After you open the Effects window, the video thumbnails with different effects are displayed. If you hover over an individual effect, the video plays and an instant preview of how the effect looks. Audio effects work the same way. This feature demonstrates a variety of effects and without time-consuming rendering. After you select the effect you want, click it to add it to the clip. You can add only one effect to each clip, and there is no easy way to adjust the intensity or time of the effects. To add multiple effects or enhance the appearance of an effect to a clip, export your project from iMovie to Final Cut Pro, where you can make more complex corrections. Or, if you're ready to get a little complicated, add the effect to the clip, and then export the clip. Then re-import it into iMovie to add a new effect. Use Command-B to split the clip into pieces and add different effects to each shape. After you've added an effect to a clip or made other adjustments to what it looks and sounds like, copy those attributes and apply them to one or more other clips in your order. Select the clip that has the timeline effects and copy it (Command+C). Select other clips on the timeline. From the Edit drop-down menu, select Paste Customizations. Select what you want to copy from the first clip to others. Copy only one effect or all of your audio and visual adjustments. Transitions are separated from iMovie 10 and can be found in the iMovie content library in the lower-left corner of the screen. Some basic video transitions are always available, while other theme-specific transitions depend on your When the transition is selected, drop it to the appropriate location. When you add a transition between two clips, it merges the video and the audio of both clips. If you add a transition at the beginning or end of a sequence, it merges with a black screen. If you don't want the sound to merge, disconnect the audio recording from the clip before or after you add the transition. iMovie doesn't have audio transitions, but to combine sound between two clips, use the volume sliders to vanish and remove the audio and overlay the clip ends. Add a pair of dissolves the transition to your video using Command + T. If you use a cross as a standard transition, it's a quick way to edit a movie. If you add a transition, the cursor is placed between two clips, it will be added to that location. If the cursor is in the middle of a clip, the transition will be added to the beginning and end of the clip. Photo: Milos Bojovic/Hack Your City/Each Friday we ask you about your best city tips: driving tips, restaurant recs, things to do, and any other advice for visitors and locals. Sometimes the theme of the week is a special city, other times it is an aspect of all cities for everyone to participate. This week hack your city, we're not taking hacks for one city, we're having hacks for all of them. We want your advice on public transportation where you live. Such as! In New York, a free ride on the Staten Island Ferry is a well-known alternative to travel to the Statue of Liberty. But the less appreciated ride is the Roosevelt Island Tram, just a $2.75 swipe at your MetroCard. We want to hear the best about your local transit. San Francisco has open-air cable cars. The Bay Area has its drinking-friendly Caltrain. Hotel Portland offers great views from the air tram. London has gorgeous double-decker buses. New York has its own hidden subway station. But we want to hear how you deal with the worst things too: What crowded stops you should get before, which train lines you always avoid, how to use a little expired bus pass, how to make a finicky turnstile to accept your tickets. And the worse your urban transit system is, the more we want to hear how you make it work for you. We also want to hear your rules etiquette whether the people in your city actually follow them. How does everyone behave so well on the Tokyo train? How does anyone behave on a Chicago bus? How do you survive a tough transit system without a dick? What external tools do you use for transit - what is the best app, map, or other guide? And have you ever found a surprisingly good hobby on your train, on a ferry, except for reading a phone? G/O Media can get commission Tell us in the comments and we highlight the best tips, secrets, suggestions and rants as they come in. Sometimes the theme of the week is a special city, other times it is an aspect of all cities for everyone to participate. My best street food hack was hiring Wafels & Dinges truck take care of desserts at my wedding. Food trucks are the trendiest form of street food right now, but your favorite eatery might be a cart, stall, trailer, or whatever rolling cooler through the park. City street food can become a legend. San Francisco's Tamale Lady can have his rest in power, used to feed drinkers at bars like zeitgeist. And I never caught Austin's Arrested Development inspired Bananarchy during the action, despite the fact that a trip across the river just to eat frozen bananas. Even general carts selling ice cream or pretzels or peanuts can become an essential part of the city or neighborhood. There's always a line of breakfast sandwiches on the sidewalk northwest of Union Square. And one winter evening, my wife and I got off a 12-hour Amtrak ride from my parents' house. It was a blizzard, one of the big ones, and all the restaurants were closed. Tromping home and shoveled sidewalks, we found a halal basket, still serving. We were home. Street food starts with trends. Lots of great restaurants, cafes and dessert spots started out as street food: New York has Big Gay Ice Cream, Van Leeuwen, Halal Guys, Korilla, and more. One of Twitter's early practical uses was a way to track taco trucks. As a genre of cuisine, it tends to be inexpensive, fast, and democratic. Although it is popular in all cities, it is especially useful in a pedestrian city, where you can eat lunch on the way to your next meeting. What is the best street food in your city or city you've visited? What are the underrated trolleys that attract crowds? How do you class up to five dollar meal to go? How do you eat a pita sandwich without dripping all over yourself? What surprising food have you found for sale on the street, or in a park, or in some other transient spot in the city? Where have you become a regular, what kind of perks you've earned, what street vendors deserve more business and some friendly duck-chat? G/O Media can get commissions And what is your street food etiquette? Got any advice up an orderly line, or how much tip a person who just gave you a gyro inside a steaming hot truck? Learned something that street food vendors in particular would like to hear? Tell us your tips in the notes below, and the Staff tab will show you the best.
